Make your own tracing worksheets for names

Inside: Name tracing worksheets that give students practice with writing, name recognition, and even starting phonetics. Name Tracing Worksheets I love how excited preschoolers get when they learn to write their own names. I love seeing their eyes light up, and watching them stand a little taller as they emphasize their work. Drawing their own names helps children gain confidence by writing letters - and develops an interest in them. Name-tracing worksheets make it easy for teachers and parents to practice. So here are some options for you to try. Name Recognition Worksheets First, you can start with these free name recognition worksheets that also provide some name tracing practice. Learning to recognize your name in the print media is an important first step in early literacy. It also has a lot of practical value... Suddenly, children can find their names on their artwork, their cubby label and their backpack. Such independence! Now more than ever, it is essential that students are able to identify their own school supplies in the classroom. With all this in mind, I created these editable name traces and find worksheets for you. Teachers or parents type three student names at once. Names magically fill up on three different worksheets. Then each child can draw their own name and then search for it on all school supplies. You can increase the challenge by entering three similar names — or at least names starting with the same letter. Or, you can make it easier by using names that are easy to distinguish. Here's what the file looks like when you open it in Adobe Reader and how you can customize it by entering the names of your own students: To get your own copy, just scroll up to the blue rectangle with my logo on it at the end of this post. Click on this, and you'll be taken to a page where you can sign up for my newsletter (which I think you'll love!). As a bonus, I'll send you these free worksheets! More namewriting practice You don't always need a special worksheet to give children the practice of writing their own names. Here are several ways to encourage them to pick up a pencil or pencil and write down their names: try a fun artistic activity like that rubbing name, and then draw on the resulting letters. Download and install a handwriting font such as Kimberly Geswein's primary points (which is free for non-commercial use) and type in the name several times for him to trace it. Get mailing label sheets from the dollar store, and let the kids write their name on a name tag sticker to wear every day. Encourage them to write their names on any work of art they create. Let them use special supplies such as scented markers, rainbow pencils, highlighters, etc. Name writing and letter sound worksheets The easy preparation name writing worksheets in my store are an engaging next step for children who are interested and ready to start learning the initial sounds for the letters in their names. Students can trace their names and colour the sound images for their letter. Then, on the next page, they practice tracing their names and reading sentences. These name-tracing worksheets are easy for teachers and caregivers to customize. You just type any student name once, and it automatically fills through the 2 worksheets for that letter - similar to the name trace and find worksheets at the beginning of this post. You can buy your own set HERE at my Teachers Pay Teachers store. You'll also find some other fun name printables in my store. There are crowns of names, spreadsheets of stamp marker names and custom emerging readers that you can customize with each child's name. Your little learners will soon find the joy of reading and writing their own names! The name recognition worksheets from the beginning of this post come as a bonus for my newsletter subscribers.
